tently in the right, to the close. The splendid meteor is forgotten, or only remembered " to point a moral, or adorn a tale."

Lords Grey and Grenville come off with honour in the late negociation, notwithstanding the attempts of hireling writers to brand them with a desire to rule supreme; for had they accepted power, without a command of the household, such is at present the force of the unconstitutional system of patronage and corruption, they would soon have found, in the language of the late Earl of Chat-ham, " the ground hollow under them," and that they would have been mere puppets in the hands of the interior cabinet, either to submit or resign, if they became refractory in attempting to carry into effect the pledges, they had so often given to the public for their future conduct. They appear for once to have been frightened into patriotism, and as so much has been said against all political parties being equally corrupt, to have been ashamed to permit the assertion to be strengthened in the present instance by their example. We are almost tempted to overlook the share which Lord Grenville took with his "relation, the great statesman now no more," in smothering the sacred flame of liberty; and to forgive Earl Grey for his aristocratical hauteur, and his apostacy from the cause of Parliamentary reform. In their late honourable stand they are rather deserving of credit for the exertion of virtuous principle, and encourage a hope that they will go on in the way to amend.

Probably great benefits would not have accrued from the change; but in our present desperate state, it would have given a little hope to see it tried. Yet in the breaking off of the negociation, there is no cause for surprise. Whoever has closely viewed the proceedings of the times, may have seen cause to dread, that in every change, the worst may be expected; and that under existing circumstances, vice and folly may be expected to prevail over plain and honourable dealing. The odds are always in favour of the worst taking place. Under such discouraging prospects, to use the words of Swift for his own epitaph, " a severe indignation lace-RATES THE HEART."
